It was a hot, sunny day, and Amelia was enjoying the peace and quiet of the riverbank. She had been working hard on her latest dig, and she was looking forward to a few days of relaxation. She had brought a book to read, and she was sitting on a rock, enjoying the view of the river.

Suddenly, Amelia heard a noise behind her. She turned around and saw a large crocodile slithering towards her. The crocodile was huge, and its eyes were cold and predatory. Amelia knew that she was in danger.

Amelia quickly jumped to her feet and ran towards the river. She knew that she had to get away from the crocodile as quickly as possible. The crocodile chased after her, and Amelia could feel its hot breath on her neck.

Amelia ran as fast as she could, but the crocodile was gaining on her. She knew that she wouldn't be able to outrun it for much longer. Just when she thought she was about to be caught, she saw a boat coming towards her.

Amelia waved her arms and shouted for help. The boatman saw her and steered the boat towards her. Amelia jumped into the boat, and the boatman rowed away from the crocodile as quickly as he could.

Amelia was safe, but she was shaken by her experience. She had never been so close to death before. She knew that she had been lucky to escape, and she was grateful to the boatman for saving her life.

Amelia returned to her camp and told her husband, Radcliffe Emerson, about what had happened. Radcliffe was furious that Amelia had been put in danger, and he vowed to find the crocodile and kill it.

The next day, Radcliffe and Amelia went back to the sandbank where Amelia had been attacked. They found the crocodile sunning itself on a rock. Radcliffe raised his rifle and shot the crocodile dead.

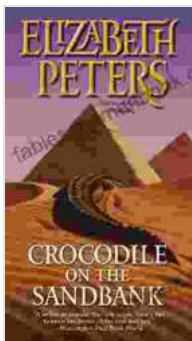

Amelia was relieved that the crocodile was dead, but she was also sad. She knew that the crocodile was a dangerous animal, but she also knew that it was a beautiful creature. She hoped that Radcliffe would never have to kill another crocodile again.

Amelia and Radcliffe continued their exploration of the Nile River. They found many more ancient artifacts, and they made many new discoveries.

They also had many more adventures, but they were always careful to avoid crocodiles.

Amelia Peabody and Radcliffe Emerson were two of the most famous Egyptologists of their time. They made many important discoveries, and they helped to shed light on the ancient civilization of Egypt. They were also two of the bravest people Amelia had ever met. They were not afraid to face danger, and they always stood up for what they believed in.

Amelia Peabody and the Crocodile on the Sandbank is a thrilling adventure story that is sure to keep you on the edge of your seat. It is a story of courage, danger, and discovery. It is a story that you will never forget.
